OBITUARY.

The late Capt. Charles Nilsson, (a notice of whose death by drowning appeared in our issue of yesterday) was a native of Helsingborg, a sea-port town of Sweden. He was born in July, 1860. Consequently at the time of his death was 28 years and 1 month old. He arrived in these islands in 1880, and shortly after took command of the schooner General Seigle and ran her in the South Sea Island trade for 5 years. He then commanded the Waioi in the coasting trade and subsequently he commanded the schooner Mana and took a lot of returning laborers to their homes in the South Seas. The vessel went ashore on a coral reef and became a total wreck, but the passengers and crew with all their effects were safely landed. Returning from that ill-fated voyage, he again commanded a schooner for the Pacific Navigation Co., and continued in that employ until they gave up the business. When the vessels of the above company were sold, he purchased the schooner Waiehu and put her on the Kauai, Maui, route.

Capt. Nilsson was a man highly respected by all who knew him for his upright and honorable dealings, and his many friends mourn his untimely demise. He leaves a widow and one child, also a father and several brothers and sisters. One brother is a resident of San Francisco.

THE VETO POWER.

The President and also the governors of most of the States are vested by the Constitutions that prescribe their duties with a negative power over legislation. They can check, if not prevent, what seems to them unwise or unconstitutional. This is one of the conservative principles in our system of Government, but yet leaving the people masters of their own affairs. It is a means of securing the sober second thought of the people's direct representatives, instead of relying wholly on original popular impulses. It is on the same principle that the legislative body is divided into two branches, that one may hold the other in check.

Benjamin Franklin, who was upwards of eighty years old when he sat in the constitutional convention 101 years ago, was a strong advocate of this division of powers and responsibilities. He was thoroughly radical, and had yet with this combined a wise conservatism befitting his years. Some one of the members of the convention asked what advantage there was in having two houses of Congress. Franklin wittily replied that it was done for the same reason that people poured their tea from cup to saucer, in order that it might cool. The veto power means much the same thing.
It is to let the tea cool still more.

This is a wisely conservative trust when properly used. It is somewhat curious that while the veto power seems to be a contravention of the expressed popular will, if it be used on any reasonable grounds, it is generally popular. It is well enough to talk about the people governing themselves directly. In practice they are rather glad to see their representatives occasionally snubbed by an executive veto. But the veto power, popular though it be, yet must be used with great discretion. Too many vetoes give the idea that the Executive is setting himself up as a "boss" of Congress. All the people wish is to maintain the proper balance between these different departments of the Government. If vetoes are issued too freely, the people will side with their direct representatives in Congress.

Gen. Jackson first developed the possibilities of the veto, and was himself a good illustration of its proper use. He had an indomitable will that made him a natural born leader of men, and the people cheerfully followed him. There is among even the freest people an instinctive desire for a leader, and this feeling has been the worst danger to most popular governments.

Washington saved us from this danger by refusing to try to make himself dictator, though possibly as much, if not more, is due to such patriots as Franklin, Jefferson, Patrick Henry and others, who created a public sentiment that made dictatorship an impossibility. We possibly owe as much to those statesmen for whom our Constitution was modified to conciliate that favor, as to those other better-known statesmen who framed the Constitution and did the conciliating.

The veto power, as it is itself a conservative measure, needs, however, especially to be used within its proper limitations. It gives an Executive no power to interfere with pending legislation, but only to check what the legislature has done and secure a re-hearing. Any other use of this power is an executive impertinence that can scarcely be too severely censured. Years ago there was much greater sensitiveness on this subject than has prevailed lately. The time was when senators and members of Congress resented the intimation of how the President regarded bills under discussion as a breach of the privileges of their honorable bodies.

The Constitution makes it the duty of the Executive to advise Congress from time to time of the condition of the country. But this by no means implies that he is to instruct Congress what to do about it. After he has given his information about the condition of the country, the Congress is supposed to be able to meet the emergency.
If the President then thinks that Congress has made a mistake, he can veto its acts and let the people judge between them. They can every two years elect a new Congress, and every four years choose a new President. With such short terms lack of harmony between the executive and legislative branches is not likely to work serious harm.

It is the universal experience of men that those unequal to the duties of their office are most likely to abuse the powers with which they are invested. It is the little men, or the accidental Presidents, who have made most of the trouble, and whose administrations have been the most scandalous. It is because they know and feel their weakness that they stretch their powers to doubtful extents in order to strengthen themselves. Really great Presidents will not get into squabbles with Congress, nor will such try to use the influence of their position to affect its legislation. After the Congress has done its work it is time enough for the Executive to give either his censure or approval.—[Boston Budget,
